Counselor's Column

Stalking Awareness Month

By Melissa McGraw

January is Stalking Awareness Month. Many of our clients in both the domestic violence and sexual assault counseling programs have experienced stalking by their former partners and/or rapists. We have also seen cases involving stalking only—in other words, there was no prior intimate relationship or sexual assault that occurred prior to the stalking beginning. These cases can be especially traumatic for these clients. They may feel unsafe everywhere they go, especially if the stalker has not been charged or arrested for their offenses. These clients may restrict their movements in order to avoid encountering their stalker, leading to increased isolation and anxiety. Counselors will often assist these clients to focus on what the client can do to feel safe in their daily lives. A challenge in working with these clients is that their anxiety is very protective and may remain high for safety reasons, making it difficult for the client to “let down their guard” for fear of becoming vulnerable to the stalker again. Stalking cases are considered high-risk and these clients are frequently referred to legal advocacy to learn about other options for their protection.

If you have been a victim of stalking, counselors are available to assist you free of charge. Please contact the Safe Passage hotline for more information: 815.756.5228.
